

Timothy Doyle

Tim Doyle is Vice President of Policy and General Counsel of the American Council for Capital Formation and its affiliate the Center for Policy Research. Tim has a diverse policy and legal background in multiple areas including energy, environment, oversight, corporate governance, and regulatory issues.

Before coming to the ACCF, he was Senior Counsel for the House Science Committee and Staff Director for its Oversight Subcommittee. There he successfully managed oversight staff involving multiple investigations and coordinating the assessment of potential investigations and facilitate the development of team-wide goals, achievement metrics, and operational oversight methodology. In addition, he established, developed, and maintained strategic relationships at the senior levels in Congress regarding energy policy and its corresponding regulatory frame work.

Tim was also a consultant for FTI Consulting, Inc. and contributed to Energy In Depth by providing research and writing services primarily focused on the use of hydraulic fracturing in oil and gas industry. Previous Hill experience also included his role as Senior Counsel and Director of Investigations for the House Committee on Natural Resources. In that role, he developed key relationships in Congress and the Administration, regularly briefed the Chairman and Members of the Committee on various energy and environmental related issues.

Before working for Congress, Tim worked in the private sector as Corporate Senior Vice President for CSS Alliance, Inc. There he spearheaded the company's business development and government relations strategy in Washington D.C. as well as identified and addressed various complex legal issues. He also regularly advised senior executives to the synergy between the business objectives and the government relations strategy.

Tim started his career as a prosecuting attorney in Michigan. He successfully balanced a heavy trial caseload while multi-tasking the ongoing review of criminal charges, maintaining the knowledge of changing case law, and drafting and subsequently arguing a wide variety of legal motions. He was also able to successfully negotiate and settled 90% of his cases, and achieved a 90% conviction rate on those that proceeded to trial.

During law school, Tim clerked for the Department of Justice in Washington D.C. at the U.S. Attorney's Office. He also worked his way through law school at the Senate Majority Policy Office in the Michigan Senate. There he researched and analyzed existing and proposed legislation from a legal, public policy, and political perspective.

Tim holds a JD from Michigan State University as well as a BA with a dual major in Political Theory & Constitutional Democracy and Criminal Justice. He is a member of the bars of the District of Columbia and Michigan.